Arctic Orienteering Club

Wednesday's Arctic Orienteering training event was a reversal of the normal orienteering way of doing things. Usually contestants are given a map with control points marked, and are tasked with finding a route to them. In a line-O, a single snaking line shows the route participants are expected to follow, and they have to determine if controls they encounter are on or off the route. Two minutes were added to the elapsed time for each mistaken punch. On the other hand, those who accepted the challenge of doing the course without a compass were rewarded by having four minutes subtracted from their time. The advanced line-O participants had to navigate without any trails printed on their maps.
